What is Addressable TV?

- ▶ Addressable TV is defined as serving different ads to different specific viewers on large-screen television devices. It is often broadened to “addressable video,” in which different viewers of any video content see different ads across their viewing devices. While television began as a fundamentally mass media, exciting recent advances have enabled it to support high-precision, high-performance direct marketing.

How Does Addressable TV Work?

Different ads are served to different individual viewers on their large-screen TV devices—even if they're all viewing the same program.

Implementing an addressable TV campaign can vary greatly from platform to platform, but partnering with Wiland makes reaching your ideal audience via their TVs easy and hassle-free.

Wiland can quickly and securely onboard our audiences directly to your account on many digital video platforms using the same industry-leading onboarding systems that enable Wiland's high-performance digital display advertising.

Wiland can also deliver audiences to addressable marketing platforms that use Personally-Identifiable Information (PII) to identify subscribers, including Multiple System Operators (MSOs).
